Money is anything that is generally accepted as payment. Ex: cash or checking account. A double coincidence of wants is necessary to facilitate the trade of goods and services, i.e., like in the barter system; a trade would only happen if you wanted what I had and you had what I wanted. Banks are financial institutions that accept deposits and make loans.

When you put money in a bank, you are technically lending the bank your money. You agree to hand over cash, and the bank agrees to give the cash back whenever you want it—but they'll spend it on other loans and investments in the meantime. The bank even pays you a small fee for giving them money, called an interest payment.
